Bio-Ethics & Faith

- May the tissues of a human fetus be used to look for a cure for Alzheimer's disease?
- Should scientists clone human beings, simply because it is possible?
- May humans manipulate the environment in whichever way suits them, no matter the effect on other species?
- Should Christians care about the ozone layer?
- Should Christian farmers grow genetically engineered foods?

These are real and deeply challenging questions for Christians today. How do we respond faithfully in a time when science and technology confront us with difficult choices?

The booklet, Becoming Human: on theological anthropology in an age of engineering life (Canadian Council of Churches), is offered as a tool to help you wrestle with these crucial issues. It does not say all there is to say but offers a way to begin to explore and discuss these matters in your small group, Sunday school class, or in the context of your worship life.

As you engage with these questions I trust you will be led to revisit the foundations of your faith, to a rediscovery of what it means to live as God's image, and to a dynamic engagement with some of the crucial questions of our time.
