Introduction to The Peter J. Braun
Russian Mennonite Archive, 1803-1920

by Harvey L. Dyck<sup>1</sup>

The original documents of the rich collection of microfilmed sources making up the Peter J. Braun Russian Mennonite Archive were assembled in the Molochna Mennonite settlement, southern Ukraine, during years of revolution and civil war from 1917 to 1920. Confiscated by Soviet authorities in 1929, they disappeared from public view for more than six decades. Yet almost unbelievably they survived. They were rediscovered in 1990 in the State Archives of the Odessa Region, Ukraine, housed in a large former Jewish synagogue in downtown Odessa. In 1990 and 1991 the documents were microfilmed for this project and brought to Canada.

Originally identified in the Odessa archives as "Mennonite Society in the County of Berdiansk, Tauride Guberniia, 1803-1920,"<sup>1</sup> the surviving collection contains around 140,000 pages of documents, organized in some 3,000 chronologically-arranged files. As the most extensive collection of in-group Russian Mennonite sources surviving from the imperial period, the archive spans a wide range of subjects in the history of the Molochna Mennonite settlement, the largest, most influential Mennonite community in Russia. Founded in 1804, this once-flourishing 61-village settlement on 500 square miles of fertile black steppe soil north of the Sea of Azov, played a shaping role in Russian Mennonite history and in the development of the southern Ukrainian frontier.

TURBULENT ORIGINS, 1917-24

The unusual story of the archive reflects the turbulent and pitiful history of Russian Mennonites during the Soviet period. Previously makers of history, they now became its victims. Peter J. Braun (1880-1933) is the person most intimately involved in the establishment and development of the archive, and the microfilm collection has been named in his honour. From the early twentieth century until his emigration to Germany in 1924, Braun, a bookish, introspective man, became a leading educator and administrator in secondary schools and teacher training programs in the Molochna settlement. As teacher and historian, who had long fostered an interest in Mennonite history among his co-religionists, he also led efforts to save for posterity the documentary record of the Russian Mennonite past.<sup>2</sup>

The idea of establishing a central Mennonite archive was seriously canvassed among Russian Mennonites before 1914, as a basis both for research and for raising historical consciousness among Russian Mennonites in need of a clearer identity. But this task was not taken in hand until the crisis of World War

1.<sup>3</sup> Then, in a charged wartime campaign directed against Imperial Germany, Russian extremist nationalists denounced all German-speaking communities in Russia as disloyal. The public use of German was officially banned. Russia's German-language press was forbidden. In 1915 a shrill press campaign climaxed in Imperial legislation to strip German-speakers in Russia of their landed property.<sup>4</sup>

Desperate to stop the nationalist slander and to head off the threatened expropriation of ancestral lands, Mennonite spokesmen scrambled to defend their community's record of loyalty and service to the empire, often citing examples out of their past. They argued, for example, that Johann Cornies (1789-1848), the most influential Russian Mennonite leader in Imperial times, had played a key role in the settlement and economic development of New Russia (called southern Ukraine today). Scores of Mennonites, down to their own day, had characteristically followed in his steps, they said. Soon these leaders realized that their ad hoc struggles against nationalist infamy were stymied by the absence of a central archive.

In the early 1930s, Peter Braun recalled the wartime crisis:

As history teacher in Halbstadt I was frequently called upon to help in such efforts. Often we spent days searching and rooting about in old papers to find some kind of essential document. Sometimes the search was successful but repeatedly we simply threw up our hands in despair because the effort was futile. We didn't even know where to start. Existing archives were at best organized by years, and had no registry or catalogue. And the registries that existed were worthless. Moreover, much material was in private hands.... Despite a plethora of material we were thus simply helpless. As we worked away we told ourselves time and again, "The situation cannot stay this way. Existing historical material must be collected, winnowed, organized, and clearly arranged in order that we know what we have and where particular documents can be found when they are needed.<sup>5</sup>

Finally, in June 1917, at its first meeting after the collapse of the monarchy, the General Conference of Russian Mennonite Churches (that represented virtually all organized Mennonite churches), quickly endorsed Peter Braun's proposal for the establishment of a central archive. Against a backdrop of deepening revolutionary upheaval that, in October 1917, would culminate in Bolshevik rule, and, from 1918 to 1920, would result in a nightmarish civil war across southern Ukraine that also devastated the Molochna settlement, the General Conference appointed a six-person archive committee and named Braun as archivist. Braun announced the creation of the new archive in the Volksfreund, a newspaper of the briefly resanctioned Mennonite press. He appealed for donations that should, he wrote, include, "Decisions and circulars of the administration, of school boards and others, Mennonite submissions to the government, old letters (especially of influential persons), diaries, various reports and other memoranda, old wedding and funeral invitations, contracts, agreements and wills, articles about Mennonites in foreign and Russian journals, newspaper articles about Mennonites, etc., in short anything of significance at all for the history of Mennonites." Since civil chaos had disrupted the state postal service, he asked that donations be sent privately.<sup>6</sup>

Although available sources do not permit the full reconstruction of the suspenseful story of the Molochna Mennonite archive, its outlines, until 1929, can be gleaned from sparse surviving records. First quartered in a room of a former Halbstadt bank, the Kreditgesellschaft, a building easily vandalized by passing brigands and rebels, the archive was moved to Braun's one-storied home on Neu Halbstadt's Zentralstrasse for greater security early in the civil war. During this turbulent time, in the midst of continuing unrest and violence, himself ill with tuberculosis, often feverish, spitting up blood,<sup>7</sup> Braun travelled from village to village, coaxing village and church assemblies to cooperate in the project. He also negotiated for document collections with custodians of major Molochna institutions such as school boards, administrative agencies, and the Mennonite Forestry Service.

A tall man, personally vulnerable, struggling hard against a natural reticence, Braun managed somehow to draw together into one collection the documentary records of key figures and institutions from throughout the Molochna settlement. Soon they overflowed shelves around the walls of a large room in his home. Hours on end he bent awkwardly over a small desk at a window overlooking the street where Bolshevik revolutionaries, monarchist units, and anarchist bands rode by. We see him through the unclouded memory of his daughter Martha, then a young child, preparing registers, sorting papers, arranging documents in files, and talking up new source donations with visitors. His young children played happily with dolls in a corner of the room largely oblivious to the commotions and dangers. His daughter remembers graphically, however, a terrifying night-time episode when her family fled to a nearby village to escape a raid by Makhnovites, Ukrainian anarchist bands who periodically pillaged the settlement. On the family's return, Peter Braun, realizing his archive had survived the raid, broke into a bashful smile.<sup>8</sup>

In late 1920, following the return of peace and establishment of Soviet rule throughout the southern Ukraine, Braun adroitly side-stepped a government decree that existing archives be surrendered to the state. He secured permission from an ethnic German confidante in the local Soviet administrative council to "found a new archive", with himself as archivist. Later, in 1924, now seriously ill with tuberculosis, Braun, in a last bid to ensure the safety of his growing collection before emigrating to Germany, had it moved to empty attic rooms of the residential School for the Deaf and Mute in the village of Tiege, some 30 kilometres away. There, he later explained, "strangers infrequently came"; one "could not imagine a better hiding place for the archive. It was to stay there until the arrival of better times in Russia."<sup>9</sup>

CONCEALMENT AND SEIZURE, 1924-29

But "better times" were long in coming. Sometime after 1924, teachers of the School for the Deaf and the Mute seem to have panicked at the thought that the illegal archive hidden in the attic above might compromise them in Bolshevik eyes and had it moved into the offices of the old Molochna Agricultural Society in the neighbouring village of Orlov. The building was on the yard of the old Cornies Wirtschaft, then owned by Peter Cornies, a relative of Johann, the great Russian Mennonite leader. Incidentally, many of the documents in Braun's archive had been written by Johann Cornies and his associates in this same building.<sup>10</sup>

The archive remained concealed in Orlov until May 1929 when the Peter Cornies family were expelled from the village in the great wave of repressions marking the start of the drive to forcibly collectivize agriculture. As the collectivizers tramped through Peter Cornies's Wirtschaft they stumbled across the hidden archive and brusquely seized it as well. Its last sighting was reported by several Molochna Mennonites in letters to Canadian relatives. In one, dated June 11, 1929, in a postscript, Susanna Toews, an Orlov resident, noted simply, ""Yesterday three wagons took the Cornies archive to Halbstadt."<sup>11</sup> Another observer described sighting the overloaded wagons en route to the regional Ukrainian town of Bolshoi Tokmak, directly north of the Molochna settlement. <sup>12</sup>

In the early 1930s, from his refuge in Germany, Peter Braun bemoaned the loss. In an article entitled, "Archives Annihilated by the Bolsheviks: Important Documents of Mennonites Destroyed in Russia," he wrote: "I have been unable to establish what finally happened to this rich archive, assembled with such diligence. It would seem, however, that it is lost to Mennonites."<sup>13</sup> In a private letter in 1931 he poured out his grief. The loss was unspeakable, he observed, because the Molochna archive had been the only significant collection of in-group Russian Mennonite sources to survive the mayhem of revolution and civil war. The once-rich archives of the oldest and most important Mennonite district administrations of Khortitsa and Halbstadt had, from 1918 to 1920, been despoiled "down to their last page". Reams of priceless documents, recording over a century of Russian Mennonite history, had been vandalized by marauding anarchist bands, or pilfered and then used as writing paper or to wrap fish and produce. Now he feared his own archival collection had met a similar end. "I could weep," he sighed. "We have suffered an irreplaceable loss, for the young archive was already rich and voluminous."<sup>14</sup> During the following 60 years, in which the Molochna archive dropped from view without one trace, Braun's sorrowful words seemed its final requiem.

Paradoxically, the confiscation of the Molochna archive by Soviet officials probably ensured its survival. In the turmoil of World War II that enveloped the Molochna region, it would almost certainly have vanished or been destroyed. As for its further destiny, the Mennonite collection likely arrived in Odessa shortly after its confiscation. The Odessa Regional Archive's file on the collection is silent about the time and circumstances of its transfer there.<sup>15</sup> What we know, however, is that by September 1937, eight years after its seizure, the staff of the Odessa archives had finished organizing and cataloguing the entire collection. At the end of what must have been an arduous and time-consuming undertaking, trained Soviet archivists who knew German well, following Russian archival principles, had reorganized the documents consisting of more than a dozen collections and scattered single records into one, seamless archive of 3,618 chronologically arranged and subject-titled files. By 1937 they had also created a lengthy, typescript Russian-language inventory (in Russian "opis"), listing each file of the collection by number and contents.<sup>16</sup>

The Molochna collection was closed to western scholars until 1990. Soviet researchers seem never to have used it, and may not even have known of its existence. For reasons that remain unclear, likely because of a decades-long virtual Communist prohibition on the serious study of ethnic German-speakers in the USSR, the book-length Guide to the holdings of the Odessa Archives published in 1961 fails even to mention it.<sup>17</sup> Moreover, a review of Soviet scholarly and propagandistic publications on south Russian and Russian Mennonite history has not turned up a single reference to the collection.

A SCHOLAR'S HORN OF PLENTY

The Molochna collection is large and varied. It is truly a scholar's cornucopia. In 1931, Peter Braun listed the documents, papers, and printed materials comprising the original archive under 14 groupings, by origin, as follows:<sup>18</sup>

1. a selection of important documents of the Halbstadt District Archive from the early period, 1803-1820;<sup>19</sup>
2. the papers of Reimer, Orlov (died around 1806);
3. archive of the Agricultural Society (Landwirtschaftlicher Verein), since 1831;<sup>20</sup>
4. a collection of the papers of Joh. Cornies, Sr. (1789-1848);<sup>21</sup>
5. the papers of the Cornies family (including a large number of family letters, as well as personal correspondence from and to official persons in Russia and abroad);

6. archive of the Molochna Mennonite school council, since 1869;<sup>22</sup>
7. archive of the president of the Forestry Service (Forstei) regarding Forestry Service affairs, since 1880;<sup>23</sup>
8. archive of the Pedagogical Program and the later teacher training programs (Lehrerseminare), since 1878;
9. the papers of Elder Abr. Goerz (died 1911);<sup>24</sup>
10. the collection of historical documents of P.M. Friesen (died 1914), author of the historical study;<sup>25</sup>
11. a collection of documents assembled by history teacher Peter J. Braun (1880-1933), including copies of many official documents;<sup>26</sup>
12. archive of the Menno Centre (Mennozentrums), 1917-1920;
13. a collection of documents of Johann Wiebe, Orlov (died around 1922);
14. a library of more than 300 books, mainly of historical content, including a number of manuscript volumes, as well as old books from Holland, etc.

How much of Braun's original collection has survived in the Odessa archives? Although the final answer to this question must await detailed study of the Molochna archive, a preliminary review by Ingrid Epp, who has compiled and edited this Finding Guide, and by me, indicates that all of the documents of the collection probably survived to be included in the reorganized Molochna archive of 1937. What are missing, however, are some 300 books and other printed and manuscript brochures. Several originated in the Netherlands, and were gathered by Braun for inclusion in his original collection (see #14 above). I was unable to locate any of these materials in either the archival holdings or library of the Odessa Regional State Archives.<sup>27</sup> Moreover, from 1942 to 1943, during the German and Rumanian wartime occupation of Odessa, seventeen percent of the 3,618 files listed in the 1937 index disappeared. They have not been found. An additional 30 to 50 files have been seriously water-damaged and cannot now be read.<sup>28</sup>

The main language of the earlier files is German. From the early 1870s onward, however, partly under Russian nationalist and state pressures, Russian gradually assumed a larger presence in official Mennonite life, and the majority of the post-1890 files are in Russian. Other languages, such as Tatar, French, and English, appear only occasionally. The Molochna archive is naturally not equally strong in all periods of Russian Mennonite history. The following breakdown of the original 3,618 files of the Molochna archive, shows considerable variation in the documentation present for each decade. Documents are especially plentiful for the 1830s, 1840s, 1850s, 1880s, and 1890s, decades of institutional flowering in Russian Mennonite life. The decades of the 1860s and 1870s, years of tumultuous change in Russian Mennonite life, are less well documented, as are events for the period leading up to and including World War I, the Revolution, and the Civil War.

There is also great variation in the number of files lost during World War II. Only around 4 percent of the files of the first half of the collection, 1803-55, have disappeared. But regrettably there are missing some 30 percent of the files for the years 1856 until 1920 (see, columns III and IV, below).

The history of the Molochna Mennonite settlement is by no means a virgin field. As sources for this history, there exist collections of published in-group documents, Imperial regional and central state papers, Mennonite and non-Mennonite newspapers, statistical surveys, and foreign observer accounts. There are also a number of dissertations, articles, and book-length studies of the Molochna settlement.<sup>30</sup> Integrated into this source and study base, the Braun archive will allow scholars to explore, in fresh and concrete detail, the development of the Black Sea steppe frontier, the history of ethnic and religious minorities in the southern Ukraine, and, of course, the Russian Mennonite story.

It should be noted that Mennonite church organizations and life are less well represented in the Braun archive than are secular activities of the greatest profusion. Official document and letter files provide much information on Mennonite relations to the state and to surrounding non-Mennonite areas. The settlement's economic and social life is richly documented. The archive contains a horde of statistical and other data on changes in branches of the economy such as silkworm culture, livestock breeding, field tillage, land-holding relations, inheritances, the early history of industrialization, financial and credit operations, and the organization of estate husbandry. The biographies and times of Johann Cornies and his collaborator, successor, and son-in-law, Philip Wiebe, are reflected in a particularly ample collection of private and official letters, documents, and studies.

The Braun archive also contains detailed District/Volost and village records bearing on local and regional administration and on the genealogies and social history of the Molochna population. In the archive, for example, is a jewel, unique in its facets, for demographers and genealogists: a complete census of the Molochna population, person by person, family by family, village by village (there were 41 at the time), for 1835. Finally, constituting the essential core of the archive, are the records of key Mennonite institutions containing much anecdotal and statistical data on their structures and activities: the Agricultural Society, the District-Volost administration in its early years, village administrations, the Forestry Service (Forstei), social welfare agencies, schools, the Bible Society, financial institutions, and many others.

UNFINISHED TASKS

The discovery and microfilming of the Molochna Mennonite collection provides scholars with extraordinarily rich opportunities for significant new work. It should be recalled that prior to its confiscation in 1929 the Molochna archive had been used in the preparation of only one scholarly article. Written by Peter Braun himself, it was published without documentation in English translation in 1929 in the Mennonite Quarterly Review under the title "The Educational System of the Mennonite Colonies in South Russia." As the author sadly acknowledged at the time, it "is all that I have been able to save from the entire archive."

Yet shortly before his death from tuberculosis in 1933, Peter Braun seemed still to clutch at the slender hope that his beloved archive had somehow survived destruction and would one day be found. In words that might fittingly be addressed to users of this microfilm collection, he concluded: "I would point out that the simple acquisition of historical material is not sufficient and offers no absolute guarantees. Almost more important is the need to digest the gathered material in a scholarly manner and to publish the results. Only then can we say that the material is truly un-lost and only then will society benefit from it."<sup>31</sup>

RECOVERING A LOST INHERITANCE

Cooperative efforts by a number of people and institutions have brought this project, undertaken at a time of disabling instability and crisis in the USSR, to fruition. After disappearing for two generations, the Molochna archive was re-discovered in the summer of 1990 in the Odessa Regional State Archives, independently of one another, by Dr. George Epp, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, and by me. From 1990 to 1992, I visited Odessa on four occasions for significant periods of research and work relating to the microfilming project. At the end of my first stay, in September 1990, in the excitement attending the find, and following difficult negotiations that threatened several times to break down under the weight of a functioning, but weakened, centralized Soviet archival system, I negotiated and signed a personal barter agreement with Vladimir Malchenko, Director of the Odessa Regional State Archives. In exchange for a microfilming system and photoduplicating machine, the Archives undertook to microfilm the entire Molochna Mennonite collection for me.

On a second visit, in December 1990, arriving in the dead of night with an unwieldy, oversized crate containing the microfilm system and cases with reels of microfilm, I encountered a city lost in gloom, Black Sea mists swirling along darkened, empty streets, store shelves bare, rumours of a military putsch rife. Yet by daylight, incongruously, almost cheerfully, I found the Archives' staff hard at work in cramped office space restoring the Mennonite collection, preparatory to microfilming, painstakingly removing stitchings from each file and mending damaged documents. Shortly before Christmas of 1990, anxious about a possible coup predicted by Soviet foreign minister Sheverdnadze in a radio broadcast overheard on the way to the airport, I left Odessa with the first lot of microfilm of some 25,000 pages.

The microfilming project proceeded in 1991 and was completed in mid-August of that year. A few days before what proved to be the abortive August 1991 coup in Moscow (the trigger to the breakup of the Soviet empire and the proclamation of Ukrainian independence), in a palpably tense political atmosphere, anxious about personal safety and government clearance, I passed custom's control of Moscow's Sheremetiev airport with a suitcase bulging with the microfilm of the remaining more than 100,000 pages of the Molochna Mennonite collection. Engulfed by conflicting feelings, I experienced my leave-taking as painfully ironic. At my feet, in the suitcase stuffed with reels of microfilm, lay the promise of a renaissance in Russian Mennonite studies. Yet at the same time, Soviet Mennonites from cities in central Asia and still surviving Mennonite villages in western Siberia and the Trans-Volgan Orenburg region were fleeing to Germany by the tens of thousands as immigrants, bringing virtually to an end two centuries of Mennonite history in Russia.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

In overseeing this enterprise I have incurred many debts that I gladly acknowledge. I thank the following institutions, groups, and individuals for help in bringing this project, accompanied by so many hopes and fears, to a successful conclusion: Vladimir Malchenko and Olga Konovalova of the Odessa Regional State Archives, for agreeing to new forms of international cooperation, including a mutually beneficial barter arrangement, for supervising the microfilming, and for their unfailing courtesy and aid; Svetlana Vishtalenko, then an Odessa radio and print journalist, for sound advice and help in negotiations of the barter agreement, for monitoring strict compliance with its terms, and for translating the Russian-language index; Anya Galkina for help with translations and keyboarding; and the Canada-USSR Exchange Program and Soviet Academy of Sciences for sponsoring two periods of my research in Odessa in the summers of 1990 and 1991.

The late and much mourned David Rempel, Menlo Park, California, a pioneer and trail blazer in Russian Mennonite studies, open-heartedly gave moral and financial support. When, sleepless with exhilaration, I first telegraphed him from Odessa that the long-lost Braun archive had finally been found, he replied delightedly, "It is incredible in its historical significance."

I am indebted to the following individuals and institutions for providing encouragement and financial assistance: Robert Johnson, Director of the Centre for Russian and East European Studies, University of Toronto; Carol Moore, Chief Librarian of the University of Toronto Libraries; the Office of Research Administration, University of Toronto; Lawrence Klippenstein, Archivist of the Mennonite Heritage Centre, Winnipeg; John Friesen, Canadian Mennonite Bible College, Winnipeg; and Sam Steiner, Archivist, and Rodney Sawatsky, President of Conrad Grebel College, University of Waterloo.

The microfilming project was organized by the University of Toronto/Conrad Grebel College Research Program in Russian Mennonite Studies, a collaborative enterprise of the Centre for Russian and East European Studies, University of Toronto, and the Institute for Anabaptist and Mennonite Studies, Conrad Grebel College. Leonard Friesen, my co-chair of the program, has been actively involved in the project, and I thank him warmly. The direct costs of microfilming the collection and preparing this Finding Guide were cooperatively funded by three Canadian Institutions: Conrad Grebel College; the Mennonite Heritage Centre, Winnipeg, Manitoba; and Robarts Library and the Centre for Russian and East European Studies, University of Toronto. They are the first repositories of the microfilmed archive.

In 1992-93, in the final stage of this project, using space and facilities generously provided by Robarts Library, University of Toronto, Ingrid Epp reviewed the entire microfilm collection and compiled and edited this English-language Finding Guide: The Peter J. Braun Russian Mennonite Archive, 1803-1920. It is a much-revised and corrected version of the 1937 Russian-language index. A trained historian and professional librarian herself, Ingrid Epp worked with skill, enterprise, cheerfulness, and efficiency. I gratefully acknowledge her help.

The confiscation of the Molochna archive had an important sequel, the founding of a new archive by the Conference of Mennonites in Canada. (The Mennonite Heritage Centre, Winnipeg, Manitoba, is its direct descendant.) This came in response to Braun's above-mentioned letter to Bernhard Schellenberg, pleading: "Since the rich material in Russia must now be regarded as lost, it is important that you in Canada start over again and gather everything that is available." In June 1933, the General Conference of Mennonites in Canada approved a proposal by Schellenberg for the appointment of a Conference archivist. See also, B. 20. Founded at the state's behest, this Society (Commission in Russian) became the main vehicle of agrarian and educational modernization among Russian Mennonites under the forceful leadership of its lifetime chairman, Johann Cornies (1789-1848). The Society survived Cornies's death, but thereafter its influence gradually waned.

21. Johann Cornies, the most celebrated Russian Mennonite of imperial times, was enormously influential throughout his Mennonite world and the southern Ukraine. He is treated as a hero figure in the otherwise informative biography by David H. Epp, Johann Cornies: Zuege aus seinem Leben (Ekaterinoslav and Berdiansk, Russia, 1909). Most recently, Cornies is described as "The Prophet of Progress" in James Urry, None but Saints, 1789-1889 (Winnipeg: Hyperion Press, 1988), 108-22. For a historiographical overview of Cornies' career, see Harvey L. Dyck, "Russian Servitor and Mennonite Hero: Light and Shadow in Images of Johann Cornies," Journal of Mennonite Studies II (1984) 9-41.

22. The chief agency of educational updating in the Molochna Mennonite settlement, the school council pushed many initiatives from its founding in 1869 until the Russian revolution.

23. Negotiated with the imperial government in the 1870s as an alternative to military service, the Forestry Service (Forstei), strictly speaking an Afforestation Service, operational from 1881 in a series of camps, was largely Mennonite-financed and administered. See Lawrence Klippenstein, "Mennonite Pacifism and State Service in Russia: A Case Study in Church-State Relations, 1789-1936" (Ph.D. diss., University of Minnesota, 1984).

24. Abraham Goerz (1840-1911), longtime church elder in the Molochna settlement, was deeply involved in public life, including negotiations of the alternative service system, the Forstei. See A. Braun, "Abraham Goerz," Mennonite Encyclopedia, II, 536.

USING THE MICROFILM AND ITS FINDING GUIDE

by Ingrid I. Epp<sup>1</sup>

The Peter J. Braun Russian Mennonite Archive consists of seventy-eight reels of microfilm, the present-day contents of collection (fond) 89, inventory guide (opis) I, in the State Archives of the Odessa Region. The title of the collection in the Odessa archives is "Mennonite society in the county of Berdiansk, Tavrida guberniia, 1803-1820". Originally it consisted of 3618 chronologically arranged files. Approximately 17 percent of the collection was lost during World War II or was damaged and cannot be read.

Microfilming in Odessa was done in 1990 and 1991, first with 35 mm. equipment, then with a 16 mm. camera. There are 31 reels of 35 mm. microfilm, covering the earlier period, 1803 to 1840 (files 89-1-1 to 89-1-643), and 47 reels of 16 mm. microfilm for the years 1840 to 1920 (files 89-1-644 to 89-1-3618). The original Russian-language inventory, dating from 1937, appears on the last reel of microfilm. The master copy of the microfilm remains the property of Harvey L. Dyck. Duplicates thereof, copied in Canada, have been deposited in three repository collections: Robarts Library, University of Toronto; Mennonite Heritage Centre, Winnipeg, Manitoba; and Conrad Grebel College, University of Waterloo.

Russian inventory (opis), checked for accuracy and corrected, and uniformly formatted, after a careful review of the microfilmed files. To give users a picture of the contents of the original archive, as organized and indexed in 1937, and as context for the files that survive, the missing files and their contents (around 17 percent of the original 3618 files number, as mentioned), as numbered in 1937, appear in their appropriate place in the index, in translation from their descriptions in the original Russian-language index.

SCOPE AND CONTENT

The Peter J. Braun Russian Mennonite Archive contains documents for the years 1803 to 1920. As originally organized by Braun, the documents of various institutions formed separate, logical entities, which Braun was careful to preserve (see pp. 13-14, above). The integrity of the original Archive's individual collections no longer exists, however. The chronological arrangement imposed by Odessa archivists reorganizing the collection in the 1930s took scant notice of the connections among files.

While this loss of association is significant, it does not impede scholarly use of the individual files or prevent scholars from at least partially reconstructing the contents of some of the original collections and identifying the provenance of files. Since it is not possible to recatalogue a microfilmed archive, the Russian index has been followed in preparing the English Finding Guide. Descriptions of individual files indicate briefly the probable source of a file, when this can be established, and the subject or form of its contents.

The origins of files in the first part of the Archive, to approximately 1860, are obvious, in most cases, to a researcher conversant with a few elementary facts about Johann Cornies, Philipp Wiebe and the Agricultural Society (Wirtschaftlicher Verein). Thus, in this section of the Archive, Peter Braun's original categories of Cornies's and Wiebe's official papers, estate papers (including those from the Iushanlee, Tashenak and Altahir estates), and personal papers can easily be traced by simply going through the entries for the applicable time period. The same applies to the documents of the Agricultural Society (Verein). Documents emanating from the Halbstadt Volost archive, 1803-1820, and the private papers of Reimer, Orlov, are more difficult to identify.

The provenance of files for the post-1850 period originating in important Mennonite institutions can be established in many cases. This applies to papers from the Molochna Mennonite School Council, and its predecessor, and those from the Forestry Service (Forstei). Family, business and official papers originating with Johann Wiebe, descendant of both Johann Cornies and Philipp Wiebe, can often be identified by someone familiar with his activities and holdings, including his ownership of the Kampenhausen estate, managed by Nicolai Penner. These latter collections suffered considerable wartime loss, but many files nevertheless survived.

It is in the smaller collections of the latter part of the Archive that the damage from cataloguing and war is most evident. Files originating with the Pedagogical Programme or the Menno Centre, and of individuals like Elder Abram Goerz and P.M. Friesen are more difficult to pin down, though an informed search by subject will identify many of them as well.

The language of the earlier files is mainly German. Russian gradually assumes a larger role until the majority of official files, after 1890 onwards, are in Russian. Other languages, principally Tatar and French, appear only occasionally.

USING THE MICROFILM AND ITS FINDING GUIDE

The microfilm is generally of high quality. It can be read using a good microfilm reader with occasional assistance from further magnifying devices. To become familiar with the character and the chronological format of the Archive, to recognize its variety and order, is to appreciate the achievement of the Odessa archivists in organizing what must have been a veritable mountain of assorted papers into chronologically sequential files. Though the Odessa file descriptions and classifications are not always precise, the basic sequential ordering of the files is remarkably accurate. Moreover, given the varied origins of the documents and the practical difficulties still facing archivists in Odessa at the time of microfilming, one is grateful for the clarity of most of the microfilmed documents.

The English-language Finding Guide is based on a review of the microfilmed files and on a translation of the original Russian-language inventory. The Guide aims to provide an accurate description of the contents of each file (whether a single set of related documents or items of varied origin or subject matter) in an inventory entry that is easily accessible. Many document files bear original German-language headings or titles going back to their beginnings, and these appear in the Guide in translation or as paraphrase. The identities of authors/sources of documents given in a file description are those that appear on the documents. Square brackets are used to identify authors/sources given in the Russian index but not evident from the file, or authors/sources that I surmise from the context, handwriting or other internal evidence of a file.

Most files were correctly dated in the Russian index. A number, however, were misdated and these mistakes have been corrected. Where a file lacks a date or the date is still in question a question mark appears after the date. No special mark is included to identify those few files only slightly out of chronological sequence. But files seriously out of sequence are identified with an asterisk before the file title. Also appearing with an asterisk are a few files covering a longer time span that the Odessa archivists did not locate precisely at the start of such a period (eg. the listing of individuals attending the Pedagogical programme in Halbstadt, 1878-1922, appears next to files originating in 1882).

The names of institutions have been translated into English to capture their meaning in the German language. Thus, Landwirtschaftlicher Verein has been translated as Agricultural Society even though its Russian-language name, kommissiya, more properly translates as "Agricultural Commission", a designation suggesting a body with executive authority, which it was. Equally, although the Forstei was principally an "Afforestation Service", it has been rendered as "Forestry Service" in the Guide in accordance with its German-language use and flavour. The Guide avoids difficult or cumbersome English renderings of names or titles from either the Russian or German languages.

For ease of use, index entries employ uniform terms and forms of description, using standardized descriptive terms for similar cases without sacrificing accuracy. Guide entries seek a uniform depth or detail of description for each file. This was often not the case in the 1937 Russian-language inventory listings.

In seeking material on a particular subject, a researcher should use a mix of subject and chronological approaches in scanning the Guide's file descriptions. Since the chronological sequence of files is not always accurate, a researcher should further scan the Guide index for files with asterisks, indicating material out of sequence (eg. 1855 items in 1885). A "see also" reference (eg. SEE ALSO 89-1-1500) may denote material that is linked essentially to the document contents of that particular file. For example, several versions of the same, or similar, documents may turn up in different files. Such references are not frequent, and I have clearly not identified all of them.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

- 1789 First settlement of Mennonites in southern Russia at Khorititsa on the Dnieper River
- 1804 Beginning of a second settlement of Mennonites from Prussia on approximately 123,000 desiatinas of land east of the Molochna River in Tavrida Guberniia. By 1811, twenty villages had been established in the Molochna Mennonite settlement. The number of villages and population continued to multiply rapidly so that by mid-century there existed a shortage of land and serious economic and social problems.

Under the administrative aegis of an Imperial office, the Guardianship Committee for Foreign Settlers in Southern Russia, the settlement enjoyed considerable autonomy, functioning with village councils and officials and a settlement, or district, council and officials.

- 1812 Johann Cornies established the estate Iushanlee on the river of that name.
- 1817 Johann Cornies received his first crown appointment. His association with the Russian government continued throughout his life.
- 1818 First of a number of royal visits to the Molochna settlement (also in 1825, 1837, etc.)
- 1820 Orlov school society founded to provide better education than that available in village schools. In 1822 the Orlov secondary school began operations.
- 1821 A division of the Russian Bible Society was established.
- 1824 Johann Cornies travelled to the Imperial summer residence of Tsarskoe Selo to purchase improved sheep stock for the settlement.
- 183? Agricultural Society was founded by the Guardianship Committee. Its German title, Verein zur foerdersamen Verbreitung des Gehoelz, Garten, Seiden und Weinbaus, inaccurately renders the original Russian name, kommissiya, which suggests more the reality, a state-affiliated institution with executive authority. The name was changed to Verein zur Erhoehung der Landwirtschaft und Gewerbe in 1836. The Society was generally known as the Landwirtschaftlicher Verein, or simply as the Verein. Johann Cornies was its permanent chairman. During his lifetime and for several years thereafter, the Society was a major force in the development of the Molochna colony, and surrounding area. Later, its effectiveness declined, although it reappears in less powerful form in the late nineteenth century.

- 1837 Guardianship Committee for Foreign Settlers in Souther Russia, with headquarters first in Ekaterinoslav and then Odessa and regional offices and inspectorates throughout the southern Ukraine, transferred from the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Internal Affairs to that of the Ministry of State Domains (responsible for Russia's non-serf peasantry, about half the total).
- 1838 Johann Cornies appointed member of the Learned Committee of the Ministry of State Domains.
- 1843 Guardianship Committee expands duties of Cornies and the Agricultural Society to include development and supervision of schools.
- 1848 Johann Cornies died and was succeeded as Chairman of the Agricultural Society by his secretary and son-in-law, Philipp Wiebe.
- 1850 General teachers' conferences were established to improve the quality of teaching.

1850s and 1860s Strife erupted between landed and landless Mennonite villagers over the division of land in the settlement. Eventually surplus and reserve lands were distributed and additional land purchased for new settlements at various times until the beginning of World War I.

1860s Mennonite Brethren Church established as a breakaway reform movement within the religious life of the Russian Mennonite colonies.

1869 Molochna Mennonite School Council was established.

1871 Changes introduced in the forms and names of local government institutions in Russia's foreign settlements. This involved little real change in the functions of existing institutions, however. Additionally, the Molochna Mennonite settlement was now divided into western and eastern districts, now called volosts, with administrative centres in the villages of Halbstadt and Gnadenfeld respectively.

1874 Introduction of compulsory military service. After several years of negotiations, the pacifist Mennonites were exempted from direct military involvement and given an alternative service in afforestation camps largely under their own supervision. Threatened military service, however, triggered the emigration to Canada and the United States of from one-quarter to one-third of all Russian Mennonites.

1880s Establishment of a number of Mennonite afforestation camps, the Forstei or Forestry Service.

1883 First General Conference of Mennonite Churches succeeded earlier

- 1880 Establishment of the School for the Deaf and Mute (the Marien Taubstummenschule). The school opened in the village of Blumenort in 1885 and moved to new buildings in Tiege in 1890.
- 1890 Under pressure from a strident Russian nationalist movement, Russian language made compulsory in many school, government and official functions.
- 1915 Russian government issued decree liquidating property held by foreigners. War and revolution prevented its full implementation.
- 1917 All-Mennonite Congress meets in village of Orlov in August. Mennozentrum (Menno Centre) was formed.
